CHAPTER L.

A BEARTLESS OLD MAN. night was cold and blustering; the wind ound the gables of an old Virginia mansion, but it finally exhausted itself, and the soft, muffled and of falling snow filled the atmosphere. The history of the rained family who had occued the decaying man-lon, was one of common ocsurrence in the Old Dominion in its palmy days. From father to son they had lived beyond their means, keeping open house, and entertaining all who ed hospitality at their hands, with a recklessness of expense that was almost royal in its profusion. Acre efter sere was shorn from their broad domains, till the Vale, as the old place was called, with a small farm attached to it, was all that remained of the once princely estate belonging to the Falconers. ossessed it, was now a drivelling old man, tremng on the brink of the grave, who, by the terms of the contract when he parted from his property, was to remain in the house, and be taken care of by the new purchaser, whose name was Ashford, till death released him from the mortal coil which had become a sad burden to him. In his youth, Reginard Falconer had been a gay rollicking man, devoted to field sports, and fond of gay companionship. He nunted, drank, and gamoled, with reckless care for either health or fortune, and at sixty he was a broken-down man-ruined. our story opens, he lay gasping out his life, with regrets that the end was so near; for he had been struck with paralysis, and to him death was ble to the helpless insulty of his present con-one act in it which he would have given much to be able to stone for. In the heyday of his career, he had married a fair and gentle girl, who, had she lived, might have changed his future, and made him happy in his home, but she was snatched from him shortly after the birth of a daughter, and he returned with keener zest than before to the amusements from which the influence of Mrs. Falconer had in a are withdrawn him.

A girl of refined tastes could find little that was congenial in that home, and Fanny recoiled from it with an aversion her father took little pains to overside the found an elderly woman of staid character and the gold to the staid character and the gold in the staid can be described an elderly woman of staid character was accomplished.

Among the gay companions Mr. Falconer collected around him were many men younger than himself and among them was one named flarry flurst, who have set that he had never yet failed to win the affections of any woman he desired to fascinate. Hearing of the boast, his host significantly said to him:

"There is one on whom your powers are not to be tried, darry Hurst; remember that. The girl I refer to has a destiny before her. My English cousin is on his way to this country to visit my daughter, and if things go pleasantly with them, the two branches of the family will be united, and Fan may be a countess yet. Clement Falconer is the heir of his mother's brother, and he is Earl of Rochdale, with a honds one rent-foll. To win him back was her one thought, and her minine wiles to that effect awakened in the heart of a dmirer a deep and genuine passion. He found one to make this known to her without incurring a observation of her father. He met her in her like, betrayed to her the expected arrival of her din, and the result that was annicipated to follow, pleaded his own cause with the passionate ardor a lover, and won it. Fanny imagined herself the rolne of a romance, and anticipated persecution at the lands of her lather if she refused to give herself ther unknown cousin.

She thought her lover the handsomest and most schading of men; what were rank and wealth hen placed in comparison with a life passed with her placed in comparison with a life passed with a ry Hurst, even in obscurity? She answered the astion as most girls of her age would have done, y owing eternsi constancy to her adorer.

CHAPTER II.

THE DISOWNED DAUGHTER.

Clement Falconer arrived in due time. He was a bluff-looking Englishman, about thirty-five years of age, with a frank manner that, at times, was almost brusque. He admired the delicate beauty of his protled, and Fanny ready to pick up the handker ver-like advances and fewer pretty speeches to the dy he had crossed the Atlantic to win. "To come, see, to conquer," was the idea of his present ven to the breathings of passionate adoration from lips she thought touched with divine eloquence, and she turned from this matter-of-fact wooer with a feeling little short of loathing.

To appeal to her father would, she knew, be useless—the first effect of her remonstrance would probatly be imprisonment in her own room, from which she would not be permitted to emerge until her consent to give her hand to her cousin had been wrung from her. On this reasoning she acted, and when the preparations for her marriage were actually begun she communicated secretly with her lover, and arrangements were made for an elopement.

These were successfully carried into effect, and one marriage Mr. Falconer was aroused from his late many bours, and when those who had gone in pur-suit of the missing girl returned with the informa-tion that she was already the wife of Harry Hurst, he uttered a curse so bitter that those around him shrank from his cruel words.

The forsaken bridggroom spoke in defence of the renaway:

"Nsy, nay, cousin, recall those words—you cannot mean them. Though Fanny has treated me badily. I can forgive her, and so will you, her only parent, when your wrath has had time to cool."

"That proves how little you know me," was the savage response. "I never forgive. Sho knew that when she defied me, but she did not care. Let her go with the beggar she has chosen, and sup poverty to the dregs; she may die in a ditch, and I will not put out my hand to help her."

"Tut, tut! that is nonsense. After all, Fanny is your child. You could not be so hard with her."

"Couldn't I? Well—we shall see. She is no longer my child—I disown her now and forever. When I had settled everything—when a future so brilliant was within her grasp, she has elected to mar her own fate, and limk it with that of a man who has not sing.—Perdition seize them, I say, and I mean it, too!"

Clement made no ronly to this, for he are the ton it too it.

Clement made no reply to thie, for he saw that Mr. Faiconer was too much excited to listen to any excuse he might attempt to ofter for his daughter's conduct. He went out to expedite the preparations for his own departure, and soon went away, never to return. He made a lengthened tour through the United States, and saw all that was most interesting to a thoughtful and cultivated mind like his; and finally, in a quiet Southern village, he made the acquaintance of a poor, but learned, professor in a college of small repute; was nivited to his house, and there saw his daughter—a girl of twenty, with whom he fell desperately in love. His heart had never been touched by his coustin; he had admired her, was willing to accept her as his wife, and had fancied that to be all that was necessary to respectable happiness in his station of life.

But Marion Bertrand tanghthin a different lesson.

ling to necept her as his wife, and had fancied that to be all that was necessary to respectable happiness in his station of life.

But Marion Bertrand taughthim a different lesson. Her dark, brilliant beauty, her passionate nature, was a new revelation to him; and, before the calm, middle-aged man was sware of his dancer, he was made captive by this young stren, married her privately, and remained in domestic felicity till he was summoned to his native land by the illness of his uncle, Lord Rochdale. He sailed from a Southern port, leaving his wife behind, till he should be able to reconcile his aristocratic connections to his plebelan marriage. The vessel on which he sailed was wrecked, and every soul on board was lost. Marion was repudiated by her hueband's connections, and the claims of her baby boy were set aside in favor of a younger sister of Lord Rochdals. In a tew years, Marion married a Mr. Melrose, removed with him to Virginia, and settled on a valuable farm within a few miles of the Vale, where the vindictive old Mr. Falconer was passing his solitury life. Marion was savar of the connection between that gentleman and her former husband, but she rarely spoke of it: her young son bore the name of her present husband, and as Clement Melrose he was known to the neighborhood.

and her former husband, but she rarely sloke of it, her young son bore the name of her present husband, and as Clement Meltose he was known to the neighborhood.

Within a mile of her residence was an humble cottage, with a few acres of badly kept land around it, which was the home of Mrs. Hurst, the discarded daugnter of Mr. Falconer. The old man had kept which was the home of Mrs. Hurst, the discarded daugnter of Mr. Falconer. The old man had kept his word, and evoly overture toward a reconciliation was harshly refused. The fortune of Hurst was small, and from year to year it diminished under his careless management. He was not a man of business small, and from year to year it diminished under his careless management. He was not a man of business mbits, and he had little stendiness of character. He loved his wife, and was always kind and gentle with her, but both soon awoke from their romantic dream of love in a cottage, to find how utterly they were unsuited to the life they had embraced. Foverly came swiftly enough, but love did not forsake them they clung together through all, and bore their hardships as only united hearts can bear them; for "Love will make endurable a thing which clase Would overset the brain or break the heart."

Utter ruin came at length; and, in a state of dead, which are took her only surviving child, Mary, a lovely girl of fifteen, and act out to make a last appeal to her father. But she found the old man as relentless as fate liself. He drove them from his presence with bitter taunts, and finally threatened to set his bioodhound on them, if they did not instantly leave his premises. They turned to go, when the merciless old man cried out:

"Stop—let me say a few parting words: as they are the last I shall ever address to either of you, you may spare time to listen to them."

His daughter paused as if spell-bound, sustaining her trembling form on the arm of her excited child. Mr. Falconer pilitensyl went on:

"Iske me, you have but one child, and she a daughter. May she bring home to daugnter, as annotation and the solution of th fair girl who accompanied him, remained a mystery to them.

If Mr. Faiconer was struck with remorse for the harshness which had resulted so fatally, ino one knew it; for he went on his way as calmly and immovably as if nothing had happened to trouble or annoy him. As time passed on, and years came and went, even the memory of the discarded daughter was lost. The old wan fell into the last decreptude of age, and to prevent the small remnant of his estate from passing into the hands of his daughter's descendants, he sold the Vale, as before stated, to Mr. Ashford, who had farmed it for several years past, with the proviso that he (Faiconer) was to be taken care of as long as he lived, and buried respectably at his decease.

A HOPELESS DEATH BED.

CHAPTER III.

A HOPELESS DEATH BED.

Such was the retrospect that passed through the mind of that old man, hovering on the brink of the great change. As the morning light penetrated to his room, he knew it was the last time his eyes would unclose to behold it, and he was not sorry that it was so. Life had become a weary burden to him, and he was not sorry that it was so. Life had become a weary burden to him, and he was willing to lay it down in that last slumber from which he believed there was no awakening.

He was attended by Mrs. Ashford, a faded and disheartened-looking woman, of middle age. Mrs. Ashford had been the principal of a flourishing seminary before her marriage, and had accumulated several thousand dollars. Mr. Ashford was one of her assistant teachers, and had married her for her money. She had loved him because he looked like a corsair and was a fine scholar. Ashford was a tyrent, and a canting hypocrite. He had got his wife's money into his possession, and reduced her to a state of domestic slavery, and was now meditating a flight to Europe with all her wealth intending to heave her articles little daughter Fantasia to shift for the articles of the safety of the latter returned his nate. the tame M. Actional and Cherals wheel was the name M. Actional and caired his wife before marriage, and which he had continued out of satirfical spite after she had found him out.

When Ashford bought the Vale, and agreed to take care of old Mr. Falconer as long as the latter should live, he supposed he would die in a few years. But the vindictive old man had taken the avarictous hypocrite in sadly. He had lived on for twenty years, to the intense disgust of Ashford, who regarded, his tenacious hold on life as an outrage and a swindle. Right glad was Ashford, therefore, on the morning on which our story opens, to learn, at last, that the old man wanted Mr. Whitney, the lawyer of the vicinity, to come and draw his will, as he left sure he should expire by the hour of noon, in accordance with a prophecy of the Falconer family.

Ashford had been for the lawyer, and was waiting for his wife to serve breakfast, which she was preparing to do, when a wild cry from Fanty drew her hurriedly to a portice in the rear of the house, from which the sound proceeded.

Breathless with dread lest some misfogtune had happened to her darling, Mrs. Ashford rushed out and saw her bending over a large wicker basket, on the top of which was written in a large, clear hand:

"A present for Mr, and Mrs. Ashford."

The child axclaimed:

"Oh, Club, there's a puppy or a kitten in there, for I here it scuffint." Oh my! how nice! but what did it come in a basket for?"

In bewildered astonishment, Mrs. Ashford lifted the basket and carried it into the kitchen. As she set it down a faint wall came from the occupant, and she gasped:

"Good Heavens! it is a child! Why on earth was it brought here of all places in the world."

set it down a raint wait came from the occupant, and she gasped:

"Good Heavens! it is a child! Why on earth was it brought here of all blaces in the world, and what am I to do with it? Apollo (the name by which she called her husband) will never let it stay, for he hates children, and he has no patience with his own."
